

Still unanswered questions about Knoxville Parkway

June 19, 2006

By ADAM LONGO

6 News Reporter

KNOX COUNTY (WATE) -- There are still many unanswered questions Monday for those who don't want to see the new Knoxville Parkway cut through their backyards.

Mark Richey, the head of "CABOL," or Citizens against the Beltway Orange Location, lives flush against the boundary of where the new road will go.

Richey says a cost benefit analysis was never completed. And he's concerned about the environment and air quality, especially since the route will go right by Hardin Valley Elementary School.

"In terms of air, the biggest impact of hazardous materials is on young people, on children," Richey said.

Among those who spoke at Monday's TDOT meeting was a lawyer who expressed concerns that pollution from the road would be trapped in the valley and lead to health problems.

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2006 WorldNow and WATE. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.